A homeowner works out what to do with her mortgage

She is selling in Calgary and buying in Kelowna, with six months left on her mortgage. Twelve screens, in order, from her first question to her broker's answer.

Demo data. Invented figures. Estimates, not lender quotes.

She types her own question

No form and no menu. She writes what she wants to know, and 4ormlQ answers with questions of its own.

A rough number is fine

She doesn't know her balance. It says where to find it and marks $410,000 as an estimate in her record.

That's fine. A rough number's enough for now, and I'll mark it as an estimate.

The exact figure is on your mortgage statement, under "principal remaining."

Probably around $410,000.

Do you know your rate, and when the term started?

2.89%. We signed in March 2022.

Thanks. I'll only use your information. If anything of Dan's is needed, he'll approve it himself.

Besides not paying for two houses, is there anything else that matters to you in this?

We might have another baby, so I want a payment that still works while I'm on leave.

That's worth planning for now. I'll check the payments against a leave, not just today's pay.

parental leave, EI pays up to about $3,160 a month, before tax.

That's roughly $4,500 less coming in each month than you take home now.

How would a payment around $2,950 feel with that much less coming in?

Tight. We could make it work, but I wouldn't be comfortable.

That's good to know before you choose, not after. I'll put it in your summary.

A lender runs its own approval using your full income and credit. This check is just for you.

So porting saves the penalty now, but could cost more every month after?

It could, unless your lender lets you stretch the amortization at renewal. That's a question for your broker.

Here's what porting saves up front, compared with a new rate of about 4.79%:

- Penalty avoided: $$410,000 \times 2.89\% + 12 \times 3 \text{ months} = \text{about } $2,960$
- Two months at 2.89% instead of 4.79%: about $1,300
- About $4,260 in total, before fees

Still worth asking. Let's explore porting first, but I want that amortization answer.
